Universities, and Political Science in particular, have provided much ammunition for the justification of colonialism and of the racism inherent in colonialism, by promulgating certain legal, theoretical and cultural myths that have justified the project of the settler state in relation to Indigenous peoples. Political Science continues to teach a curriculum that is light to entirely free of Indigenous content, or of critical race and post colonial theory. Universities and political science departments continue to say, regretfully, that they cannot offer more courses, enrich the existing canon, hire more Indigenous scholars and scholars on Indigenous issues, or recruit and support ...

Land Acknowledgments, the invocation at the beginning of a number of events and activities of the Indigenous peoples upon whose traditional land these events and activities occur, have become de rigeur. Yet, there is some concern that these invocations are done by rote, and without sufficient mindfulness of what histories and relationships the invocation recognizes. Moreover, there is no evidence that this tentative first step in recognizing Indigenous territories leads to recognizing the past and contemporary colonialism and racism that frames Indigenous existence. In this Roundtable, discussants will consider whether Land Acknowledgments constitute a collective reflection on colonialism, particularly as ...
