Chair/Président : David B. MacDonald (Chair: Settler, Professor of political science, University of Guelph) This roundtable engages with legal and sociological conceptualizations of genocide, and the concept's applicability to the experiences of Indigenous Peoples in what is now Canada. Participants will reflect on how genocide is defined and in what ways the settler state, state institutions, settler societies, and Christian churches have instigated forms of genocide. A key focus is on how the legacies of genocide can be reversed in the present and future. We will also examine how the discipline of political science can change its approaches and methodologies ...

The "new mindset" of the federal government has been to move away from traditional values of procedural fairness and effectiveness in order to act with agility and swiftness in securing desired policy outcomes in recent years but even more so during the pandemic. As the Clerk of the Privy Council noted in his 2020 Report to the Prime Minister, "Agility is our mindset: as this global pandemic quickly evolves, ...

This roundtable will take up the conditions that lead to reconciliatory processes in states seeking a recognition of history and a formal process of recognition and apology, in order for all parties to move past the matter which produced the wrongs which reconciliation is supposed to transcend. Topics include responsibility, recognition, remorse, accountability, reparations, repaired relationships, and of course, the formal commitment to go forth and sin no more. In Canada, the singular focus of reconciliation has been the residential school genocide, and the Calls for Action ...

M29 - Roundtable: Academic Freedom and the Politics of Higher Education Chair/Président/Présidente : Dax D'Orazio (Queen's University) Discussant/Commentateur/Commentatrice : Shannon Dea (University of Regina) Academic freedom is the unique right of scholars to comment, publish, research, and teach free from undue constraint. It serves as the bedrock of the university, allowing scholars the freedom to pursue truth and knowledge in the public interest without fear of reprisal or subscription to orthodoxy. As university campuses have become more politically significant over time, debates about the proper limits of academic freedom have flourished. Like ongoing debates about the proper limits of free ...
